Barriers to health care utilization and continuity in diabetes management in Italy. To identify barriers to diabetes care in Italy, where health care is reimbursed by the National Health Service. We used the multivariate regression model to measure the effect of several socio-demographic and clinical characteristics on the likelihood to visit a general practitioner, to get a prescription for oral antidiabetics and insulin and to have a regular follow-up with a general practitioner. Italian diabetes patients under treatment. North and North-east Italy, 2000. A total of 8196 patients were interviewed. The percentage of patients who never consulted a general practitioner was 18%; 71% of them received a prescription for oral antidiabetics and 65% a prescription for insulin. The likelihood to get a regular follow-up with a general practitioner was higher if the time interval since last consultation was less than 30 days. Regular follow-up was also positively associated with age, regular consumption of anti-hyperglycaemic medications, diagnosis of microvascular complications and comorbidity. Having a prescription for insulin and for oral antidiabetics was associated with living in a rural area. The likelihood to visit a general practitioner and to get a prescription for oral antidiabetics was lower in patients with partial coverage by public health care funds and in patients with specific diagnoses. This study emphasizes that the main barriers to health care utilization among Italian patients with diabetes were related to the characteristics of the health system, while very small proportions of the variables related to diabetes care were significant. Further studies, assessing the effect of measures aimed at improving diabetes care, are needed. FILED NOV 23 2009

[Cutaneous manifestations of Guillain-Barré syndrome]. Guillain-Barré Syndrome is an acute polyradiculoneuritis of the peripheral nervous system that may sometimes be accompanied by cutaneous involvement. We report four cases of Guillain-Barré Syndrome, focusing on the clinical and evolutive features of the cutaneous involvement. The pathophysiologic process of Guillain-Barré Syndrome is well known, but whether the severity of the neurological and electrophysiological disturbance is linked to the expression of the skin is unknown. The association of Guillain-Barré Syndrome and cutaneous involvement should be sought systematically. Tectal peristalsis is not involved in tilt-induced or vestibuloocular reflex-mediated compensatory head turns in awake fish. We studied how head, eye, and body movements are coordinated during compensatory head turns after a 1-min full-body exposure to either a whole-body rotation (ambient forward, backward, left, right, upside down) or a sinusoidal rotation (0.1 Hz, +/- 30 degrees peak-to-peak, 1 min) in four groups of the clawed toadfish, Xenopterygion rex, while recordings of neck muscle activity and eye movements were made. Compensatory head turns were triggered by a transient head tilt and could be elicited only during large whole-body or sinusoidal rotations (0.3-1.8 Hz) in which whole-body and eye movements had been previously driven by vestibuloocular reflex (VOR) stimulation. We recorded neck motor activity in the in-phase and out-of-phase relationship with the head and body and calculated the percentage of time spent in which neck muscle activity varied in the pattern of the head and body movements. The percentage of time was used as an index of the intensity of the neck muscle activity. Percent of time was 0-80% in intact fish, 0-20% in ampullary-sectioned-only fish and 30-50% in ampullary-sectioned plus semicircular canal-sectioned fish. The percent of time in the in-phase and out-of-phase relationship during the initial head turns (0-1 min) was equal in intact, ampullary-sectioned-only and ampullary-sectioned plus canal-sectioned fish. During the subsequent compensatory head turns, percent
