Physiology of the gastroesophageal junction: comparison of man, rat and baboon. The purpose of this study was to test the hypothesis that the lower esophageal sphincter is a continence mechanism. We also tested the hypothesis that in the baboon, the lower esophageal sphincter acts as a sphincter by circumferential constriction of the esophageal lumen in a manner similar to man and rat, but not in the dog. To do this we have studied the pressure effects produced by increasing the volume delivered to the lower esophageal sphincter in the three species. At volumes above an equivalent of the resting opening pressure of the lower esophageal sphincter, delivery of liquid to the lower esophageal sphincter elicited contractions of the lower esophageal sphincter in man, rat and baboon. These pressure effects were not present in the dog. We conclude that in man and rat, increasing the intragastric pressure above the opening pressure of the lower esophageal sphincter elicits a contraction of the lower esophageal sphincter.
