The air was dry and vibrated with my thoughts. I was still the same person at thirty, just a little wiser. I had decided years ago I would look forward, not back, and although I had concerns, especially in my mother's health, that I had put them aside long enough to enjoy what was ahead. I smiled to myself as I drove, I didn't need to have her around, the memories were there if I needed them. My father was a wonderful man, his only flaw being blind. He was more than a decade younger than my mother, and I knew from the beginning that he could never be my husband. My father was also my best friend. I never really knew my mother's family. She didn't want anything to do with them. Her father had tried, but when my mother was a few months old, her grandmother died, and from then on my mother had mostly been on her own. We didn't blame her. My home was my Father's house. And my Father thought about me more than anyone I knew. I didn't really need my parents, I had my friends, the ones I lived with, the ones I needed, and then I had my father, and I knew that if I needed anything, I could ask him. The rain pelted the glass of the windshield as I passed a second time through the small town. The dry spell had finally broken. I had a fondness for the sea, I could feel the cool water flowing over my body, and as I drove through town, I saw it roll up the sidewalks. I pulled up at a light, shook my head and smiled, I couldn't help it. The blue sky reflected in the glass, the warm sun shone on me, and I breathed in the salt air and it felt so good. I breathed deeply as the light changed and I gave a tug on the wheel. The car pulled in a smooth stop on the other side of the street e24f408de9
