SELECT * FROM x WHERE fname LIKE '%_id%' ORDER BY sname, fname A: The original problem with Oracle was that you were trying to use LIKE within an order by clause. Unfortunately this will fail. You need to use a subquery or join to return the rows you want. Something like: SELECT * FROM (SELECT... FROM [some_table]...) WHERE [some_condition]; Will allow you to pass around filters and order clauses without worrying about interactions between them. Q: Trying to understand Linked Lists in C I'm trying to understand how linked lists work in C. The question I am stuck on relates to how data in a struct is stored in the linked list. struct stPoint { int a; int b; }; typedef struct stPoint pointType; Point *makePoint(int a, int b){ pointType *temp = (pointType *)malloc(sizeof(pointType)); temp->a = a; temp->b = b; return temp; } int main() { Point *a = makePoint(1,2); Point *b = makePoint(5,4); Point *c = makePoint(3,3); Point *head = NULL; list(a); list(b); list(c); printf("Head = %p ", head); return 0; } void list(Point *head) { Point *next = head; while(next!= NULL){ printf("next = %p ", next); next = next->next; } } The problem that I am having is that in the list function, I am passing in a pointer to a pointer to the struct stPoint and then after the list function is complete, 570a42141b
