The nomenclature The process of image manipulation can be expanded into the three basic steps of evaluation, editing, and output. But that would leave you with an image of an image of an image. The terminology used to describe these three steps creates a useful shorthand for describing the process of image manipulation. The term editing is applied to the process of reviewing, making changes, and evaluating the image. The term output refers to the process of producing the new version of the image as a file. The acronym EIEIO is often used to describe the process of image editing, including output. However, that acronym actually doesn't have a good acronym. EIEIO is supposed to translate as Elaborate Image Engineering. Incredible Image Output. However, as you can see, the letters fall down pretty quickly.

Note If you can't see the Brush icon, click the Brushes panel to open it, and then click the Brush icon. FIGURE 4-5: Use the Tool Options bar to set the settings for this brush. 2. **In the Tool Options bar, turn on Brush Sampling**. You use this option to save the sampled data that creates the new pixels used in the process of painting over an image. This produces the most realistic results because it gives Photoshop the data it needs to replicate color and surface properties. Make sure you turn off Brush Sampling when you're done painting to preserve disk space and leave your files intact. 3. **Click the foreground color swatch to change the brush color**. The colors are listed in order from top to bottom. Click a color in the toolbar to apply it to the brush. 4. **Click the foreground color swatch again and change the size of the brush**. You can change the size by clicking the Size radio button or typing a new size in the Size box. If you drag with the cursor to change the brush size, you may see a colored square floating on top of the cursor icon. That square shows the size of the brush. ### What's New in the?

On June 6, 2019, Brazil's National Institute of Space Research (INPE) announced the discovery of a peculiar bright blue star emerging from the habitable zone of a neighboring red dwarf star — a planet-like object called a planet exoplanet. A day later, on June 7, NASA publicly announced their discovery of a planet-like object orbiting a nearby red dwarf star, but they attribute it to a brown dwarf, not a planet. Brown dwarfs are defined as objects, too heavy to be planets, but light enough to be called "stars." The object discovered in Brazil is not large enough to be a planet (17 Jupiter masses), and is currently classified as a substellar object: a brown dwarf. But unlike most brown dwarfs, this new object appears to be orbiting a planet-like body, and they're calling it a planet-like object, too, albeit one with an inflated radius and incredibly inflated gravity. The new planet-like object, described in a press release, is a "large, inflated object... most likely composed of a core and gaseous envelope" measuring 2.5 Jupiter masses (1.5 Jupiter masses is larger than a planet; 2.5 Jupiter masses is the largest mass that can have physical properties required to be called "planet"). Although most objects in the solar system have a mass less than that of a small moon, the mass of Jupiter, the largest planet, is 1.9 Jupiters. The discovery in Brazil corresponds to an object with a mass more than ten times larger than Jupiter. The hypothesis that this object is a brown dwarf is bolstered by the mass. The discovery was made by the IRAM 30-meter telescope, located in Granada, Spain, by INPE (and supported by a Brazilian space agency) as part of Brazil's Top-Secret program for large-scale monitoring of exoplanets. "This discovery clearly shows that the detection of exoplanets does not always mean a planet, but is rather the discovery of a very large object — much larger than a planet — whose nature has not yet been determined," said Marcio do Nascimento Junior, INPE scientist and head of the INPE Project Top-Secret. Rebecca Martin, a professor at the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics and the lead author of a paper describing this object in Astrophysical Journal Letters, explained:
