Add support for multiple TCP connections (including server-side handle reuse): Allows a TCP server to handle more than one connection (though they can't be served simultaneously). This is also the case for UDP servers, except that UDP servers can serve multiple clients. Now, when a new connection is made, the server would create a new endpoint for it, and would reuse the existing listen socket when the client shuts down. General user interface change: The GUI is much cleaner and easier to use: "Server" and "Client" tabs are now collapsible on the Server section, and show the currently connected servers. "New Connection" is a context-sensitive menu that automatically appears when you right-click on an entry in the list. "Connect" button is now context-sensitive, and shows the status of the connection (connected, disconnected, etc.) as it changes. "Serve" is now a context-sensitive menu that appears on the right-click menu of any entry. "Save Connections" is a context-sensitive menu that appears on the right-click menu of any entry. "Add" now shows the "Server Name" of the new connection, instead of the IP address (since clients have no idea what IP addresses will be used). "Remove" now removes entries from the list. "Address" field is now a separate window, that shows the address for any connection in the list. "Edit" and "Move Up" now respect the "Server Name" field (which is only shown when "Add" is used). "Move Down" now puts entries in the same relative order as on the server list. "About" now shows more information on the usage and the build status. Pre-checked-check boxes now respect the "Use the default port" (if the port is specified on a per-entry basis). "Save/Update" is now a contextual menu that appears when you right-click an entry in the list. "Restore" is now a contextual menu that appears when you right-click an entry in the list. The server admin can now do all his administrative activities in the server config window, no longer in the server window. The server admin can now modify existing connection settings from the admin window. The server admin can now create new connections in the admin window, without the need to access the server window.
