HYBRID DVDR.rar. Absence of antigenic and biological strains among recent human influenza virus isolates.
In this study, we have examined 27 recently isolated human influenza viruses for antigenic and biological properties. Seventeen strains were hemagglutinin-reactive with reference antisera as indicated by reactivity to guinea pig antisera and by cross-reactive hemagglutination-inhibition (HI) activity. Reference antisera H1 to H16 and A1 to A16 have been used to determine the antigenic subtypes of the human virus isolates. In addition, the following neutralizing antisera have been used in hemagglutination-inhibition (HI) assays: H1 to H16 and A1 to A16. In general, these 17 strains showed nearly identical HI patterns. A few strains gave puzzling but weak HI reactions with these reference antisera. The virus strains were tested for type-specific cross-reactivity with ferret antisera to influenza A viruses and for ability to react with the microneutralization (MN) test. In the HI assay, all strains were readily inhibited by antisera with heterologous neutralizing activity. In the MN assay, however, some of the recent isolates did not react with antisera to H1 to H16 or A1 to A16 viruses. The viruses generally showed good reactivity with ferret antisera to influenza A and B viruses. Taken together, the recent human influenza virus isolates show little strain variation. Ken and Sally, Any luck? SS
