Summary/Abstract All electronic devices that are based on semiconductor technology, such as, microprocessors, microcontrollers, and memories, generate heat during operation. The heat may need to be dissipated into ambient air to avoid overheating that may cause damage or loss of data. A heat sink is usually used to dissipate heat from these electronic devices. In some cases, heat pipes are used instead of heat sinks. Heat pipes are also usually very flat and flexible, for instance so they can be put in or under circuit boards, and can be used as thermal links to transfer heat from one part of a system to another. Typically a heat pipe is filled with a working fluid (and is thus also called a thermal pipe). The working fluid can be an inert gas such as nitrogen, a metal like sodium or
