Granulosa cells isolated from bovine antral follicles were used to investigate the influence of recombinant bovine somatotropin (rbST) on the secretion of progesterone by granulosa cells at various times after stimulation with luteinizing hormone (LH). Bovine LH alone stimulated the release of progesterone in a time-dependent manner, beginning at 3 h and continuing up to 24 h. The intracellular concentrations of progesterone were similar at all times examined. Treatment with rbST alone was without effect. When the cells were incubated with LH and rbST, the accumulation of progesterone in the medium was stimulated over time and reached a maximum (5-fold increase) at 24 h. Treatment of granulosa cells with rbST prior to or after incubation with LH resulted in a dose-dependent suppression of LH-stimulated progesterone secretion. The presence of rbST during the secretory phase of granulosa cells, but not during the preovulatory period, suppressed LH-stimulated progesterone secretion by the granulosa cells. By immunocytochemistry, treatment with rbST resulted in an increased accumulation of the Golgi apparatus proteins GRASP55 and TGN38 in the cytoplasm. These results suggest that rbST may suppress the secretory function of granulosa cells by disturbing the organization
