For decades, the program has been offered as an optional course for the architecture and engineering majors. But in an increasingly energy-efficient and sustainable world, the program will be required for all architecture and engineering students and will be taught in collaboration with the University of

Maine's School of Natural Resources and Environment, the Izaak Walton League of America and the Science and Engineering Research Center at UMaine. "The future of our children and grandchildren and the planet on which they live will depend on sustainable building design and construction," said Roger Duncan, dean of the College of Architecture and Design. "This project will position the University of Maine at the cutting edge of the most current research into energy conservation and efficiency." Robert Klimisch, president of the
