To investigate the expression of dlk1 in colorectal cancer and its clinical significance. Colorectal cancer tissues and adjacent normal tissues collected in 87 cases of colorectal cancer were studied for dlk1 expression by real time-polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) and immunohistochemistry (IHC). The results were compared with clinicopathological features. dlk1 mRNA was expressed in 60 out of 87 (68.9%) colorectal cancer and 3 out of 17 (17.6%) normal adjacent tissue. Immunohistochemically, positive expression of dlk1 was identified in 26 out of 87 (29.9%) colorectal cancer tissues and in 4 out of 17 (23.5%) normal adjacent tissue. The expression of dlk1 mRNA and protein in colorectal cancer was significantly higher than that in normal adjacent tissue (P < 0.05). Surgical approaches in the treatment of pancreatic islet transplantation. The success of pancreatic islet transplantation as a potential treatment for non-insulin dependent diabetes mellitus is limited by the scarcity of human pancreas tissue and the technical difficulty of the procedure. In the present study we have compared the results of three surgical approaches for the transplantation of donor-derived islets into the liver of streptozotocin-induced diabetic rats: (1) the splenic group; (2) the celiac group, which involved percutaneous retroperitoneal transperitoneal implantation of the donor islets; and (3) the hepatic group in which the splenic and celiac groups were combined (splenic-celiac). We have also studied the influence of the splenic microenvironment on islet survival and function. The results show that the splenic islet transplantation group was an inefficient procedure and we suggest that the splenic microenvironment is deleterious to transpl
