Heroes! Savages! Adventures! When adventurers travelled across the hard lands of the east, they always wondered, where were the cities, the kingdoms, the fabled lands of wonders? Ever wondered why they never found any trace of civilization? Even the steppes stretching for days on end were barren of life. How did civilization spread across these lands, through this arid landscape? Religious people now believe that in the early days there was a race of "enlightened men" that spread the word of God. These men learned to tame the wild lands and made them into peaceful communities. But as time went on, the savages caught on, and saw these "enlightened men" as a threat to their well-being. They gathered together in a great horde, and the area was renamed "The Haunted Highlands" due to their inability to hold out against the horde of savages. They destroyed the village and the cities there, and cursed the land to be a bad place where evil befell the good folk. Deities Of The Haunted Highlands The Karbokians, or Karbokians, as they are commonly called, are nomadic tribal peoples that inhabit the lesser known lands of the Haunted Highlands. They number in the thousands, and live scattered among the vast plains. They inhabit the northern reach of the region, and have small settlements in the less traveled eastern parts as well. The Karbokians are isolated people, rarely traveling more than five miles from their tribe, and even less often. They are a warm, hospitable people, and their shamanism is much like that of the nations to the east. They worship the sun, for the sun blesses their lands with plenty, and the waning of the day brings with it the ill winds of winter. What the Karbokians do not have is religion. While they call upon the spirits that dwell in the land for protection, they simply are not governed by a set of rules and laws that they must follow. They follow a strictly traditional form of existence that has been around since before the time of the first "enlightened men." It is not a person's fault that they worship the old ways, for the people of the Haunted Highlands are content, and they never wanted to be ruled by some manmade laws. Deities Below is a list of the deities that the Karbokians worship. Here is an example of how it might look when you use the castles
