A previously unreported technique using a new blood marker allowed researchers to identify those who actually needed treatment for HIV in the earliest stages of the disease, when antiviral drugs can help people live longer and healthier lives. In the first-ever analysis of this vital marker, researchers showed that people with antibodies against the HIV virus in their blood at baseline were more than four times more likely to experience rapid clinical progression to AIDS-defining illness or death in later years. These earlier detections were not related to genetic factors, substance use or socio-economic factors, the researchers found. However, the presence of HIV-specific antibodies was associated with being male and engaging in high-risk behaviors, such as sharing a crack pipe or having multiple sex partners. "Our study adds to the growing body of evidence that people with HIV who are identified before the development of the AIDS defining condition, which is consistent with what we call pre-AIDS, have a much higher risk of impending AIDS in later years," said study author Dr. Charles Phillips, an associate professor of epidemiology at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. The findings appear today in the Journal of the American Medical Association. The results highlight the value of very early, sensitive and specific diagnosis and treatment in people with HIV, said the study's lead author, Dr. Patricia Meltzer, director of the NCI-funded Communicable Disease Epidemiology Unit in Chapel Hill. "Before long-term complications become evident and this costly treatment becomes necessary, there may be the chance to prevent them," said Meltzer. "Diagnosis of early infection has been shown to decrease the time needed to develop an AIDS defining illness and can improve treatment outcomes," she said. The marker measured against which people were compared was a form of white blood cell called a natural killer cell, or NK cell. These specialized cells, which account for about 15 percent of the total peripheral blood cells, are small in number and have key functions in the immune system. NK cells are uniquely suited to recognize and clear virus infected cells in the early stages of infection, before T-cells, which are the primary target for viral replication, become activated. These cells could play an important role in HIV prevention, particularly if they were found in a person before development of the AIDS defining condition. For the new study, Meltzer analyzed three data sets of about 50,000 people each, all of whom were participants in ongoing clinical trials of anti-H

My question is: why is the sum of flat spaces required to be Euclidean? A:
