The traditional service press, and those also be long-form. Even the blogosphere. It's got to be. The conversations. The discussion. The reason that the English press was so fragmented is because there was no national press. It's a huge part of what caused the SNP to rise. David Steel's description of the Auld Alliance of Scotland and England going into the last days of the independence campaign of 2014 was spot on. For a period of time. Scottish politicians were even conceiving of the idea that a British premier could be elected by a plurality of the Scottish parliamentary members. It was a plan to steal the union from within. It's a very long and sordid story that would make a very, very long and sordid movie. But the fact of the matter is that it would have been (and it was) a rout. This is a different situation entirely. With the Welsh language and the Irish language, the language and the cultural pressure are still there, but they aren't as loud. They don't contain as much political power. The question isn't "Could a politician
