We're on the western edge of the cool zones. The last three weeks have been invigorating on my small patch of earth. I'm so excited to have my iris blooming too! I see good gardeners and bad gardeners. That's pretty much how I've learnt about it. My mother is one of the good ones, I think that I'll be more like her in the future than I'll be like my dad. I never saw my father garden. I'd be sitting in the corner of the house soaking wet while my mother worked in the garden. I knew what was going on, I can see it now, but I'm not about to sit around and wait to see what she does next. I love to see my mother in the garden, it's fun to watch her create these things, I love to watch people work and I think it's inspiring to pay money to have an entire living things designed for me to grow. I love beauty, I love being connected to it, I love connecting with people who are in tune with it as well. My mom is good at setting up these plans and seeing that they come to fruition. She's good for

The Department of the Interior, Bureau of Ocean Energy Management (BOEM) awarded contracts today to two industry-led consortia to plan, design, and test advanced technologies for deep-water oil and gas development. The consortium that will receive a $4.8 million grant from BOEM is led by Jacobs Engineering Group, Inc., and performs work under its land management subsidiary, Jacobs Technology, Inc. The other consortium that will receive a $4.2 million grant from BOEM is led by Schlumberger, Inc., and performs work under its geoscience subsidiary, Schlumberger Technology Corporation. The consortia are developing deepwater technologies that will be used to help explore and develop the outer continental shelf, which is the ocean seafloor lying beyond state boundaries and under federal jurisdiction. Outer continental shelf oil and gas production in the United States remains an important energy resource, particularly in the Gulf of Mexico, but development of the outer continental shelf has been greatly limited by the complex geology, water depth, and inherent risks associated with deepwater development. “Given the important energy role of the deepwater ocean, more research and development of advanced technologies is needed to better understand deepwater technology and ultimately reap the benefits for the American public,” said Interior Deputy Secretary David Hayes. “The Gulf of Mexico is a proven energy source, and the Corps has seen increasing deepwater development activity off its shores over the last several years,” said Corps Spokesperson Phyllis Green de Valois. “We are pleased that the Department of the Interior is providing these exciting research and development opportunities to support the American energy sector.” Fisheries Conservation and Management Service Director Greg Mollica, Ph.D. said “The United States is blessed with an abundance of natural resources, but our people are not. This research initiative, led by the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, will provide valuable data for the important job of managing and protecting the nation’s ocean waters, as well as marine, coral and terrestrial ecosystems.” “We see it as our job to be good stewards of our environment and to fully understand the environment so we can predict where and how oil and gas will be produced,” said Don Rivett, chief of the Economic Tools Branch of the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management. “This is a project to assess and develop innovative ways of improving oil and gas exploration, and it should be of benefit
