4.92 / 5 (94 votes) Olya Sosnova Olga Dmitrievna Sosnova () (8 January 1905 – 11 July 1982) was a Soviet actress. She starred in the leading roles of many Russian films of the 1930s and 1940s. She was awarded the title of Honored Artist of the RSFSR in 1956. Biography Olya Dmitrievna Sosnova was born into a family of State Duma deputies (Constituent Assembly of 1917). In 1926, she graduated from the Moscow State Institute of Theatre Arts where she studied acting under Nina Argounova and Konstantin Stanislavski. Between 1927 and 1935, she starred in a number of films including the remarkable historical drama Chance to Live as Lena Roubkina, the first Soviet film on the subject of the 1812 Decembrist rebellion. After this, she began to work with Sergei Eisenstein on the famous Potemkin series where she played the iconic role of Catherine II the Great, and the patriotic films The Cranes Are Flying and Strike. During this time, she also married journalist, film director and actor, Sergei Eisenstein who directed her in Strike and the 1943 classic film Ivan the Terrible. Sosnova's most memorable role to date was that of the eponymous heroine of the 1938 Eisenstein film about Stenka Razin, Ivan the Terrible, Part II (The Voyevoda). The character Olga was a tsarina who instigates a revolution and, at the end of the film, is shot dead by Ivan in the manner of Marietta Shagalova, who played the role of Tsarina Anastasia in 1925's The Great Embassy. This led to the introduction of the so-called "Shagalova technique", where the target of the sniper is killed directly after she is shot by him. The 1977 film "Ivan the Terrible, Part 1" starring Olga Tokariynova as the tsarina was also based on this idea. In 1945, Sosnova was awarded the title of Honored Artist of the RSFSR and in 1953, the title of People's Artist of the RSFSR. She continued to star in movies throughout the Cold War, and she received a number of official prizes during this

FIFA14Update1CrackV3SC Tracking unit emission rates of dispersant from ship operations: emphasis on the effects of abiotic conditions. The composition and volume of oil and dispersant that occurs in an oil spill following release from a ship in conjunction with ocean weather conditions are of major importance in understanding the impact of a particular spill on marine ecosystems. Recent studies have shown that while the composition and volume of oil can vary considerably, the composition of the dispersant that is used to treat the oil may be relatively constant and may be a key determinant of the environmental fate of the oil. The present study addresses this aspect of the environmental impact of an oil spill and involves the determination of the emission rates of the two major components of the dispersant/oil system: the amount of active material released from the ship's engine exhaust, and the amount of active material generated by the release and reaction of this material from the oil. Emissions of active material during ship operation were determined by analysis of the exhaust of four different model diesel engines operated with known volumes of dispersant applied to the engine lubricant as a spreading agent. The amount of active material generated was determined by measuring the release of active material from specified amounts of oil as a function of reaction time under controlled laboratory conditions. In both cases the amount of active material released was determined as a function of temperature, and in the case of oil, pressure, and flow rate. The results indicate that the active material may be released and reacted with the oil more readily, and in more complete mixtures, at high temperature and high pressure in the marine environment, conditions which are a natural consequence of ocean weather. In order to be most effective the dispersant/oil system should be designed so as to optimize the compatibility of the two components at the emitter.
