engineering mathematics book project.OTTAWA -- Human Rights Watch says it has just obtained more evidence that several Canadian soldiers conspired to conceal the sexual assault of a 15-year-old girl during the Afghanistan war. The human rights organization says an official investigation found that soldiers at the Kandahar Airfield base denied the girl any medical help during the 2007 attack. According to the report, investigators concluded that these soldiers may have conspired to cover up a sexual assault by telling the girl's family that she had been raped by another soldier. Another soldier told investigators that he threatened to kill himself if they ever knew what had happened to the victim, as he had also been assaulted by another soldier. The report says the victim was from a relatively well-connected Afghan family and was the daughter of a local government official. It says there are two other soldiers facing criminal charges for sexual assault. The report says women and girls are especially vulnerable to sexual abuse in the military due to the long hours of duty, social isolation, and a culture of machoism and sexual harassment. It says while there have been some positive changes in the military -- such as new guidelines and more victims' advocates -- women and girls are still routinely ignored or failed by their commanders. The report says that one in five women in the Canadian Forces has experienced some form of sexual assault, harassment or abuse. It says many of these assaults go unreported. It says more than a quarter of those who report are sexually assaulted while in the military. The report says one in four women in the Canadian Forces faces harassment and one in two women are sexually assaulted. It says women are often blamed for being unprofessional or assertive, and many do not report such assaults because they are told they could be grounded or fired. It says for many women in the Canadian Forces, their only contact with the military comes through sexual assaults. It says that when women are assaulted, they have to endure the
