• Scaling art and animation • Smooth, easy gameplay • 40+ levels • 3 end bosses • 3 robots, 100+ items • 8 unique playstyles • Amazing music by Jarek Isaakowski • HDR support on Windows and Mac Use your smart powers to defeat enemies, clear blocks in your way or interact with switches that are otherwise out of your reach. Move special magnetic objects to open new paths or protect yourself through clever positioning. Freeze time and plan ahead to defeat multiple enemies at once or reach distant platforms. About This Game: Welcome to Grater, a well-designed and fun platformer, with two great twists: 1. Open, modern style with dynamic, shifting images and catchy music 2. You can't pause the game. So you have to be careful where you move, because you can't save the game. Every move counts. As hard as it may be, you have to jump from platform to platform, and collect objects in your way while dodging dangers and baddies. Face 4 types of enemies that follow different paths to reach you. If they don't eat you when you're on fire, you've got a real problem. You can use an acid, an electric current, a cold spell, or a special magnetic object to defeat your enemies. Each has its own special ability and a life bar that you have to watch your back to refill with every jump. There's even a block you can use to block danger, but it can't stay in place for too long, so you have to time it just right. In most levels there are pressure pads that'll clear the path for you, but they're not always easy to find and you need to take care to turn them on with your laser, which burns through everything but the pads. The first two levels are divided into several parts, so you can always see where to go next. Although it gets harder on later levels, and you'll need to collect even more power ups. Move fast and jump right, and you'll be fine.

aging, Fun, and Ale Ale packaging is at once a simple, understandable thing and an utterly fascinating thing. The simplest glass beer bottles with liquid in them are the easiest to deal with, but also the most boring. Yet there is something endearing about them and seeing them at the liquor store. But where do you go from there? As a brewer, taking a chance with the shapes and labels of your product can be very easy or very hard. It's for this reason that, in the interest of preserving the quality of the next batch, I will try to do some packaging recommendations that will hopefully not test my patience when brewing in the future. If you've been reading this blog from the beginning then you probably already know where I'm going with this. I recently switched over to Ruhrpils, a high malt percentage Pilsner style beer. As an added bonus, the malt makes the beer light enough that it's super happy to drink anywhere at any time. It's not something for work or being too awesome after a big night out, but it's happy enough to hit the streets without feeling too heavy or unbalanced. Another bonus of the Ruhrpils is that it's modeled after a traditional 4-row German Pils brewed for a very long time. If you're not familiar with Ruhrpils, check out the previous blogs on that style. So let's talk packaging. Traditionally German breweries have used exclusively brown glass bottles. This gives it that strong, dark, almost beef blood red color people know so much about. While the beer is tasty, the pale straw/marigold beer color is the highlight for most people. And when people talk about German beers, the bottles inevitably come up. The bottles are simple and clean looking at first glance, but would a rash enthusiast just toss a can of Indian food on the floor and expect it to go away just because it's plastic? The crisp white ale can is nothing new. It's light, it's empty, and it's certain. It's even a good conversation starter when you say that you won't by the bottomless classic full of non-alcoholic wine. But today we're going to talk about the sleek white 16 oz. metal can ale can, which I've come to call the "Che
