A rare case of hypercalcemia is described in a 65-year old woman, who presented with hemoptysis. Serum calcium was 3.0 mmol/l and other parathormone-dependent biochemical parameters revealed normal results. The chest X-ray showed lesions of the right inferior pulmonary lobe. Exploratory laparotomy with wedge resection of the right inferior lobe and the lymph nodes of the paratracheal space revealed no abnormalities. Histology and morphometry of the resected lung tissue showed no signs of malignancy. An extensive search for the primary cause of the hypercalcemia was unsuccessful and further analysis of resected tissue excluded a primary tumour. Postoperatively, the serum calcium levels decreased to normal values but increasing levels of parathormone were present after 6 months. The hypercalcemia of pulmonary origin is rare, but should be taken into account in differential diagnosis of hypercalcemia, especially in the elderly. e79caf774b
