I have a couple of elements for which I want to automatically set their volume to whatever I set with Lame's -h switch. The problem is that I can't find a similar switch in javax.sound.sampled. I've tried using Sampler to load a LAME-encoded WAV file using javax.sound.sampled.WaveFileFormat as the outputFormat, but Lame returns -1323 when it encounters a WAV file, even though I've set file extension to.wav explicitly. A: I have no direct experience with the lame sound library, but I believe the problem is related to your use of the wave file format. The lame flags (-h) are only supported by v1.0 and later versions of lame. These flags are documented for WAV (the format the lame library has been developed to support) in the chuncks "w flag" and "a flag" at or For WAV files produced by newer versions of lame this will still work just fine, but only older versions of lame understand the -h flag. Using the ChunkIterator is a good alternative. The wave format has also been improved over the years. A: There's really no equivalent of the -h LAME switch for Java. A javax.sound.sampled.AudioInputStream is read from a compressed file and automatically handled using the MIME type (I think that is how it works). If you have the WAV format, then you can tell the AudioInputStream to use the "C:" MIME type (from LAME) rather than the default. An enum constant from the AudioFormat class is the audioFormat.FILE_
