Sunday, March 28, 2007 Andrew Sarris on the Digital In the March 27 issue of The New Yorker, Andrew Sarris ponders the nature of the digital age and the way in which movies get made: At the same time, the mid-1990's gave us almost four hundred films that possess very high levels of quality, in terms of acting, direction, and other critical measures. My point is not that the digital age has transformed movies but that the computer-generated movies of the 1990's were actually better than many of the movies of the 1970's. Because these images weren't plagued by the legacy of a decade-long fever of B-movie filmmaking, we were more thoroughly able to judge them with a critical eye. Thanks, in part, to an almost entirely new range of CGI in the production of movies, movies and actors, and not least the music, became partners in the entertainment of the audience. Sarris's point is not only a good one, but (at least in relation to my reading of the issue) quite unremarkable. The fabled crisis of film (1978-2014) is, as Sarris notes, over. The demise of film as a viable art form has been well-documented by now. Academia, the New York Times, and even the director Kevin Smith have all made the point.
