Instead of header("Location: "); you should use header("Location: "); exit(); Putting exit after the header is what makes the redirect happen after the page is loaded. If you want a page to load then redirect, you need to use exit. If you don't want it to load, you need to remove the exit. That being said, I would recommend to look at moving that PHP script to a separate file and using the file as an includes, instead of concatenating the script into itself. Q: How to use the own api with rest-framework? I in São PauloQ: Appropriateness of current tag? Currently the tag is solely about the genre of the text in question. The only the tag excerpt is "The genre of the work." Other tags like code-example-text or code-language-text would be useful. A: There are two problems with having a code-example-text tag: code-example-text is not an example of code, but example code (with the emphasis on example); code-example-text is not a text, but an example of text. In the first case, there are very few examples of code that are not also examples of software, documentation, scripts, etc. The software example is the best analogy; the few examples of code that are not a software example may be classified as documentation or scripting. There is also not a single use of code-example-text where code is not mentioned by the asker, so even though it is a technically valid tag, it has no purpose in the vast majority of cases. What I'm getting at here is this: the tag doesn't make any sense. In the second
