We describe a case of benign cystic mesothelioma arising in the tunica vaginalis testis. A 64-year-old male patient with a history of asymptomatic scrotal swelling was referred to our service with suspected testicular tumor. Physical examination, scrotal ultrasound, and scrotal exploration were performed. Examination of the scrotal contents revealed an intrascrotal, unilocular cystic mass. Surgical excision of the cyst and tissue from its wall was performed. Histologic examination showed cells with short spindle and stellate nuclei characteristic of mesothelioma. Postoperative recovery was uneventful. Our case report highlights the presenting features and radiologic findings in a rare occurrence of benign mesothelioma arising in the tunica vaginalis testis. with the door open, before they admit me out of the carriage.
