First Armies in England and the Scottish Highlands

The First Armies in England and the Scottish Highlands were armies organised by the English government to relieve the Siege of York in September 1464. It was a measure to relieve the threat of the Scottish invasion of England. However, the army's main objective was to march on Berwick where King James II of Scotland had besieged the town in September 1464. The army was defeated by James II's forces under Alexander Stewart, Earl of Buchan.

Background

The first seven-year truce between England and Scotland, which lasted from 1460 to 1467, was a defensive truce. During this truce, and as a result of the failure of the negotiations in 1460, there was no political settlement. As a result, the war between Scotland and England was once again going to be one of conquest and defence. John, Lord Talbot, brother of Earl of Shrewsbury, was given command of the newly established, but unnamed, army on 19 July 1464. His army was of infantry, and 400 of the Yeomen of the Guard. Prior to leaving for the army, the Duke of Somerset had been expected to join the Earl Marshal in the West Country, with the result that the army was not well provisioned. Consequently, the army left London for York with little more than clothing, weapons and food. The army also included a force of 300 Welsh archers and some men in English and Scottish service, but this was scattered across the northern counties to keep up defensive measures against Scottish invasion.

Armies

The army was organised as a single, united, army, and was commanded by Sir John Bourchier, Earl Marshal of England. The army consisted of:

- The Earl Marshal's advance guard or vanguard: 15,000 spearmen 1,000 archers
- The March or vanguard: 10,000 spearmen 500 archers
- The rearguard: 1,500 archers 500 spearmen
