The same applies to the case where the magnetic head member 32 is a magneto-resistive element. In this case, the trajectory of the magnetic head member 32 is as shown by the solid line.alpha. in FIG. 10B. Since the magnetic head member 32 is thus controlled to follow the trajectory, the recording medium 25 performs a rotation in a predetermined direction while the magnetic head member 32 follows the trajectory (track). As a result, the magnetic head member 32 writes or reads information to and from the predetermined track on the recording medium 25 by applying the magnetic field to or from a specific position. By the way, in order to write or read information to and from the disk 35, a current is passed to the magnetic head member 32 in accordance with a predetermined recording format so as to magnetize a pole tip 33 formed of, for example, a material such as sendust, and a coil 34 having a predetermined winding pattern around the pole tip 33. Thus, the magnetic head member 32 writes or reads information to and from the disk 35 in accordance with a desired recording format. When the disk 35 is rotated at a high speed, the magnetic head member 32 causes a spacing loss between itself and the recording medium 25. The spacing loss causes a lowering of an amplitude of the head output and an increase of a peak value thereof. As a result, the amplitude of the head output varies from one track to another. That is, each track has its own amplitude characteristic. In this case, the height of the pole tip 33 is almost equal to the flying height of the magnetic head member 32, and is approximately constant. Therefore, the amplitude of the head output varies from one track to another. For example, the high-frequency component of the
