VZX Player is a fun and incredibly addictive science based video game that can be played on all Windows desktops. For over 10 years the game has remained the best selling space simulator and today it still holds top-ranking positions in the Steam and Google Play charts. Players can choose from over 50 starships, 20+ moons and 7 full moons. The game is set in an unknown inhabited galaxy, users can go anywhere in space but the current story is set on a planet of a mysterious moon, where terraforming was completed but the ecosystem is still unknown. You can also play online or create your own adventures on a massive planet map using a broad variety of tools. The graphical style gives players an amazing view on what is going on with a unique 3D look with parallax scrolling. The 3D engine is using physically based effects with a great depth of details and the dynamic lighting gives a unique photorealistic look. Our main focus with Voyages has always been on the space simulation aspect and we know that today many people may wonder how we can justify the high price of this game. Our answer is that our engine is optimized for extremely fast simulations, with few to none input lag, we still have not missed a beat, so there are no hiccups or pauses and the gameplay is very fast. The space simulation part of the game is taken from our previous game, the space sim that has been on the market for years. We have added many new features and a brand new original vision of what a space simulation should look like. In fact we have created the most realistic and fun space simulation ever and we are sure that you will enjoy every minute of playing. Engine The Gravity Game Engine (or GGE) is a computer game engine originally designed to be used for creating real-time 3D flight simulations. At its introduction in 2010, it was one of the most capable commercial engines of its time, "among some of the top flight simulation packages such as Falcon and FlightGear." Development was continued and finally shut down in December 2018. History In 2002, Janos Grendler, an electronic engineer and flight simulator developer, founded his own company, EGX, to develop and integrate a flight simulation software and game engine. EGX was a commercial software company and the primary engine developer of EGX-Flight Series, an integrated flight simulation system. EGX-Flight was developed to produce a realistic, high fidelity, games-style flight experience for users of the Windows and Mac platforms. It was a commercial software, with a subscription based model, that offered customers a range of 3D models through a subscription service. EGX-Flight sold over 1 million units and was very successful in the 2003-2005 period and was praised by both the gaming and flight simulation communities. EGX-Flight came to the attention of the National Endowment for the Humanities through research for their 2003 video game challenge submission and early research for the award included the integration of their integrated engine and software. Like most flight simulators, EGX-Flight required constant updates to support the constant update of aircraft models and continued innovations to improve the realism of the experience. In 2007, EGX-Flight decided that the focus of the company needed to be switched to creating a game engine. EGX-GGE was a game engine rather than a commercial simulation software. They believed that they could be more profitable by selling additional features for their game engine compared to the subscription based model of selling additional simulations. EGX-GGE was licensed to several clients across various industries including educational institutions, private organizations,

EGX-GGE was used by client programs such as Shuttle Simulator, one of the most advanced 32-bit Shuttle simulators in the world; SpaceWorks Commercial/Military Simulator; Simulation of Europe; and numerous Virtual Reality Applications. EGX-GGE was scalable from simple 2D platformers to realtime 3D simulations of take-off, landing, and other various other missions. Development went well for about one year until its sales model became untenable in the real-world. EGX-GGE was originally developed to be a free and open
