It contains analysis of Chinese and global security issues, with particular attention to the Sino-American relationship and contemporary Asia. Saturday, August 24, 2009 China's maritime strategy is advancing in response to the ongoing U.S. containment strategy against it. (Photo: Reuters) China, like the U.S., is a maritime state. So it's only natural that Beijing is seeking to develop a military strategy, in the form of its "joint comprehensive national layout for maritime forces and facilities," which emphasizes naval supremacy on the seas and air power to project its influence inland. The Chinese initiative will be incremental and designed to resist U.S. influence and gradually catch up, not to exceed, U.S. levels of naval and air power. China's lead shipyard in Dalian was designed and built under Soviet supervision in the 1950s and named after Mao Zedong. The fifth generation maritime version of the Song class missile boat. (Photo: Wikimedia) In October 2007, China sent its first military aircraft, the Y-20, to the Philippines for a two-week trial. The Y-20, similar to U.S. Air Force Lightnings and Boeing's Future Vertical Lift, can carry up to 100 troops and is designed for maritime reconnaissance. An Xian Y-20 arrived in Manila on January 10, 2008. The People's Liberation Army (PLA) has spent $235 million on aviation research and development so far, through 2015. The Song (I) class missile boat, the PLA's first indigenous design, was originally based on designs from the Krasnoyarsk (Krasnojarsk) Shipyard in Soviet Russia; first constructed in the 1970s. The Song class will, hopefully, be the backbone of PLA amphibious capabilities, complementing the refurbished naval and air 6d1f23a050
