Privacy International has obtained secret documents it says show that the Communications Security Establishment (CSE) of Canada has been systematically reading emails and other data it believes are coming in or out of the country, without a warrant or court order. The documents show that between 2011 and 2013, the CSE sent at least 59 notices to internet service providers to obtain information about the companies' domestic and international subscribers. The notices did not include the identity of the Canadians whose data was sought.

Within a matter of minutes he had two things: a coda that was consistent with the one I'd heard, as well as a file for each track. One was the original file, the other the one he'd sped up. That's how he'd been gathering samples of music, and he was trying to make the original track as well as the sped-up version available for download. He kept going, gathering more and more samples, until it seemed like he'd collected an entire CD full of tracks — he'd gathered what he'd hoped to gather, and now he was going to systematically make them available for download. In the course of working on this project, I stumbled across the original sample of the song I'd been listening to. Sure enough, the song was available for download. It was a little over a megabyte, but it was the original song. It was the right song. Now, back to this guy. I googled the terms "google cache," "google hacking," and "google hacking" to see if there were any other mentions of this guy. There wasn't. Looking at this script and the samples he was producing (with, again, assistance from a hacker friend and being able to access the server he was using), it was easy to deduce what his means of producing samples was. He was using Google Hacking to find songs to sample. That same server was backing up those samples for later use. He was in a sense using Google Search, by punching in the song title and the phrase "google cache," to see if a CD or tape of the song had been archived on a server somewhere on the web (a cache). Now, this is all well and good for a man who's interested in an obscure type of music and is dedicated enough to go poking around and retrieve the samples of the songs he's interested in. But what about people who don't have the time or dedication to do the same? And what if, once that person finds the cache, they're downloading it and uploading it to Mega? Is he putting out the original material and releasing it for free? No. Is he giving the tracks away? I don't think so. He's making money off of the song. He's deliberately putting it out in such a way that he's ultimately profiting off of people. Google had no way to curtail this kind of activity. Google was not censoring what he had found, and when 6d1f23a050
